Common Market. The arguments back and forth were lively, but conducted on the part of the British members with the greatest courtesy. They seemed to me exceptionally well informed men, many of them widely traveled. Amongst the number was Lord Dalkeith, son of ~~Nxxxx~~ Mollie Buccleuch. He, and almost all the others, seemed, aside from politics, to be greatly interested in sport. I got home after midnight.

I went to the meeting this morning of our Consuls, who ~~were~~ have convened here to be briefed by Mr. Schwartz, of the Department of Commerce, on the visits to be made in April by representatives of American business organizations with a view to promoting American exports. I thought the ideas put forward were sound and well calculated to promote the sales of the machinery and equipment in question in the British Isles.

John Laylin, the Washington lawyer, came to see me. He is here on legal business. We hashed over the Danish ship deal, with which we had been ~~mutually~~ concerned, I for our Government, and he for the Danish Government, for such a long time in Washington.

I lunched with the Duke of Hamilton and the Board of Building Societies Association, at 14 Park Street. It was a pleasant affair. E and I had stayed in the Duke's apartments in Holyrood House in Edinburgh last summer. He was once a member of the House of Commons, and is Premier Duke of Scotland. I like him. He is said to be something of an eccentric; a great sportsman, he was once amateur boxing champion of Great Britain. It was on his place that Rudolf Hess descended during the war in an unsuccessful attempt to bring about, according to Hess, peace
